The first to suggest which of these I suspect is true was Prof. Dr. H. H. H. Breyne. Prof. Breyne has also been engaged in researches with regard to the Phragmites and he has come to the same conclusion as Prof. T. J. H. van der Valk, that the Phragmites is not a species that can be regarded as a true indicator of the water level. The reason is that the Phragmites can grow in water up to 1.5 m. deep, whereas other indicator species such as Scirpus and Carex are restricted to water depths of less than 0.5 m.

Nonetheless, despite the recent advances of learning theory, there are still many challenging issues, problems, themes, and research directions for future studies. Higher learning stages and individual people have different characteristics, growth of college students' cognitive skills, emotional growth of children and teenagers, etc., are especially important and require more attention when the learning environment can be optimized for better learning outcomes. Thus, this article will be helpful for

In summary all the processes involved in the formation and migration of the various types of galaxies have been considered in this paper. The present focus is the formation of the various types of galaxies. The first largely agrees, the second also has to agree to the underlying theory. However, the third agrees with the assumption as many theories of galaxy types, even the most recent ones, cannot be identified with it.

The personal effects of the author of this, Dr. R. W. Blyden, have passed through
